The Agreeable Guest.

She does not continually compare your town, house or belongings with hers.

She is appreciative—interested in all that is done for her entertainment.

Does not make fun of a play or concert she is taken to, but finds some good, and criticizes gently at best, knowing that her hostess is not responsible.

Does not change her dress four times a day unless events demand it.

Does not spread her belongings all over the house, and leaves her washstand and dresser in order.

Seems to enjoy her food, but does not talk much about it.

Does not inform her hostess that she "adores chocolate cake," and then refuses to eat it when it is procured.

Takes an interest in the magazines and daily papers in order to give her friends an occasional breathing spell. Sees and hears as little as possible of any thing unpleasant that may happen.

Is prompt at meals, and causes little trouble even to servants.

Does not invite herself into the kitchen to watch the hostess cook.

Does not find fault directly or indirectly with her friend's clothes or domestic customs.

Never examines anything handed her for her approval and lays it down without some comment. Silence can talk.

She tries in every way to fit herself into the home which is hers temporarily, to become a cheery, happy factor in its life.—Farm Journal.
